Two boys, John Mason and Ben Humphries, were playmates away back in the fifties. Eleven years pass by and the little town of Webster, W. V., was all astir one day, when there appeared on the schoolhouse fence a notice calling for volunteers to fight for the union. "We'll fight together," says John to Ben—but it was not to be. Ben shook his head—the spark was kindled. "My people, my sympathy is with the South, my duty is there." Thirty-five years elapse, John lives in Ohio, a son 28 years old his only companion, who has just been appointed to an important government position in Virginia—there chances to meet a retired old southern planter, who turns out to be none other than his father's companion and later his enemy. Young Mason learns of this, but not until he has fallen in love with Col. Humphries' beautiful daughter, Elsie. The complications that follow develop a most interesting picture. Dreamland theatre.
